For decades now, the public have accepted that, in fact, we are supposed to vote Labour because it looks good on paper, but we won't act on those in power because it is in our national interests. Yet, after this latest loss, we were told that this is how governments were supposed to work, and to give us a sense of why that's the case in a general poll. It's easy to understand how these are the views of those with deep pockets and a vested interest in the status quo. But why was that so obvious to the majority of people?.. By the way, our next tournament is just a day away. On the heels of a stunning loss at the polls, the Labour party (and its leader Jeremy Corbyn) were left feeling a collective snooze, and a deep sense of frustration about the way these elections were conducted. But it would appear that Corbyn has now found some inspiration from some left-wing thinking when it comes to the way democracy is supposed to work.. Perhaps it has to do with politics and the way it can be used to further our own personal agendas and to make our own decisions. Perhaps it is the lack of a strong opposition and a willingness within our public to challenge our rulers. Perhaps it's the way that the dominant elite are using the ballot box to advance their own interests at the expense of the people that makes it increasingly necessary to challenge those in power and challenge the government. Whatever the reason, it is clearly not possible for this system to work. People cannot vote according to the dictates of an establishment that is the product of centuries of indoctrination and a century of class privilege..
